Machiavelli, on the other hand, recognised that in every republic there are two different dispositions, that of the populace and that of the upper class and that all legislation favourable to liberty is brought about by the clash between them.

Niccolò Machiavelli (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy) Machiavelli is confident that citizens will always fight for their liberty against internal as well as external oppressors. Indeed, this is precisely why successive French monarchs have left their people disarmed: they sought to maintain public security and order, which for them meant the elimination of any opportunities for their subjects to wield arms.
